LEOLA;

THE MYSTERIOUS RANGER.

A Tale of the Mexican War.

By T. Hamilton Vananda. or of " Alleto," " The Miller Patriot," " Wild Tormit," " Almoni," " Jessie Wharton," etc.

THE TRAVELLERS-A DIS NOVERY-PLOTTINGS.

The evening shadows were gathering deep and last in the Valley of Mexico, as two foot-travellers, of way-worn appearance, paused upon a high ridge of the National road, beyond the village of Acapulco, and gazed thoughtfully down upon the city of the Aztecs.

The travellers were of the bronze complexion of the native Mexican, and wore the usual loose blouse and trousers of the rustico, or vinedressers. Their hair was straight, and black as a raven's, and they might have been taken for prothers, so nearly were they costumed alike, but the striking difference in their attitudes, and their mold of features, denied any tie of consanguinity. One was over six feet in height, and his features were swarthy and rough, while the other, but a little over the medium stature, was handsome, and walked with an easy, if not ele-

They stood for some moments gazing upon the picturesque scene which surrounded them. On brought him to another, of a similar character right rose the hill of Contreras, flanked by ter. what appeared its twin-sister, Et Penou; to the left Cherabusco lifted i's towering head, showing but a peak of Chapultepec, while El Molin del Rey seemed but a mole hill between. Through the vista of these broken heights.

like a diamond guarded by an army of giants, lay the ancient city of the Aztecs. "By San Jago! Pietro," said the younger of the two, "the Americanos will have some fight- Jago! that strong, firm step is familiar!" ing when they come to assault our city-is't not

"Rayther looks like it, I reckon," said the latter traveller, in a coarse, husky voice. "Even should they be able to get a footing here upon Contreras, or yonder upon Cherubusco, how would they ever pass yonder towering height of Chapultepec, guarded as it is by our great Military College, that can sweep every causeway by which they can advance?" "Have a pooty tough time of it, I reckon." said the tall Mexican, who seemed to be a man of few words.

"But come," said the other renewing hi journey, "we have still three miles or more to go, and I am-anxious to kiss the barmaid of the Hotel de Carlotta, before the clock of San Pedro strikes nine." "I should like to be in a comfortable bed before that time, I reckon," said his taciturn comdown the hill. They walked on at a rapid pace, and in comparative silence, until they reached the Tete du Post, when the younger one said : "Although you are older than I, friend Pie tro, you have never been in the Capitola, and I would advise you not to show your ignorance by too much talk, while here. "Thankee, I'll try and profit by your advice,

I reckon," said the other, good naturedly. "You cannot be too discreet, you know," said the other, "because we might get into any amount of scrapes. They might take a fancy to impress us into the army, for instance, and then what would become of our vineyards? Let me do the talking, Pietro." "Perfectly satisfied, I reckon," said Pietro. By this time they had reached the city, and entering by the Garita di San Cosmo, they soon diverged into a by street leading to that portion of the town occupied by the middle classes. They had not proceeded fat, when they paused before a small dow house, painted green, with a "Hostella di Carlotta" painted in front. The younger raised his finger, in token of caution, and they entered. There were several persons in the room, who appeared to be of a respectable class, and who reemed to be so pre-engaged in the perusal of the papers, that they paid no attention to the entrance of the travellers. There was a young and buxom-looking girl schind the counter, which stretened across the room, and approaching boldly, the young traveller accosted ber :

"Good even, mio amigo. What is the quality of your wine to-night?" "As good as you will get anywhere in the San Martina, or even in the grand Plaza," she replied, smilingly. "What shall it be,

"Give us some staunch Vera Cruz; for we have travelled far to-day, and need something to revive us," said the traveller. "You look wesried, Senor, shall you not stop at the San Corletta to-night ?" said the girl, as she proceeded to deal out the wine. "Such is our intention, provided you can furnish us with comfortable quarters," he re-"That you can have of the first quality, my ndsome Sonor," she answered, with arch co-

"These save your compliments for ten min-utes, and give us some supper," said the traveller. And while the pretty waitress went to prepare their meel, they took their glasses and eat down as a table in a retined part of the

The young man gave a rapid glance at the persons present, and then carelessly took up a paper. He had scarcely glanced at it, however, when his eye suddenly kindled and glanced rapidly down the column.

"Ha! Pletro, here is news!" he exclaimed it an excited, but undertone. ' Read it." raid the other in the same key. "The Americanos landed safely at Vera Cruz on the 9th, and by the 11th had taken up a strong position in front of the city." "Good-no, no, I mean bad," said Pietro with a confused air. "General Morales, the Governor of the city thinks he can destroy the Americanes, and has devolved the command on General Landero. At this point the maid re'urned with their supper, and they fell to with a will, for they were evidently hungry. The meal dispatched at a sign from the younger, they both arose and by request, were shown into a comfortable sleeping apartment.

When they were left alone, they sat, for some noments, gazing into each other's faces. At last, the younger smiled and said : "Well, Kit, here we are in the heart of the memy's country, how do you like it ?" "Pooty well, as far as I've got, I reckon, answered Kit Galen-for I suppose my readers have recognized him and his companion ere this "But," added Kit, philosophically. "It's considerably more comfortable for you, Cap'n, than 'tis for me. I never had a great hankerin' arter larnin', an' if I had, I'd a never been able to catch yer darned Spanish. And the idee of keepin' my mouth shet, for—the Lord on'y knows how long! is quite agonizin'. I allers had a pooty strong fascination for expressin' my idees; when I git an idee, I must speak it, and— "My dear fellow," said Travis, his whole demeanor changing at once. "Think not of the embarrassment you suffer, or the danger you incur. Think only what brought you here, and

"Wal, I spose it will," sald Kit. "Mariano 'll cancel a good deal, I reckon. I wonder what they'll think of us in the Regiment?"

"What can they think?" asked Travis, earn estly. "Have we not over served our term of enlistment several months. I came to Mexico for revenge, and, thank Heaven, the hour of its consummation is near at hand. Let us to bed. that we may rise early. We must sleep as we are, in our blouses, for fear some chance intruder hould discover our uniforms."

Without further ceremony, they lay down on the bed, and, worn as they were from fa tigue, they were soon asleep.

Ere the first beams of the morning sun had gilded the flag-staff of the Military College on the heights of Chapultapec, Travis awoke, and arose from his bed. The noise woke the ranger, who was susceptible to the slightest sound. "Yer airly, Cap'n," said Kit, rubbing his "Yee, I want to take a walk in the mark places, and reconnoitre certain points of the city.

Remain in bed until my return." And donning his wig of straight, black hair, and examining his stained face in the glass, he went out, while Kit turned himself over for another nap.

Travis on descending to the ground floor, found the bar maid already at her place, and taking drink, and telling her not to waken his comrade until his return, he left the house.

Turning into a small street, he traversed it for some distance, when it diverged into a broad and handsome avenue, near the end of which was a market. He new assumed a careless, rustic gair, and lounged leisurely through the bazaar, appar ently examining the vegetables and early fruit, but in reality watching every person who met him. He traversed every part of the market, without any apparent gratification, when he left it, and by taking a triangular course as well as the streets would permit, ten minutes walk

He was on the point of entering one of the aisles, when a woman brushed past him, with a basket on her arm, entering before him. He caught but a glimpse at her face, beneath her broad brimmed hat, but it seemed to have a great effect upon him.

"I have seen that face before, I think," he muttered, as he hurried after her. "Ay, by San | FOR SALE VERY CHEAP—2 HOUSES He remained behind her, until she paused at a stall to purchase some articles, when, as if by ac-

The girl looked up smilingly into his face, wher es if moon-struck, the basket suddenly dropped from her hand, her eyes dilated, and she seemed about to utter a scream of surprise, when Travis exclaimed, in a quick whisper: "St. Jago! girl, would you betray me? follow

He started carelessly on toward the other and of the market, as though nothing had hap, ened, while Mariano-for it was she-picked up her basket, and with trepidation of heart, and trembling form, followed hard after. When they had gained a retired spot at the end of the bazaar, Travis turned and said :

"S'death! is my disguise so poor that could recognize me so easily?"

"Your disguise, Sefior, is excellent," she plied, anxiously, "and impenetrable to less searching eyes than mine. It was your voice betraved von."

"You did not expect to see me here, Mariano?" "Far from it, Senor. Why are you here? Or at least, without an army to back you? You are treading on a volcano!" she answered, eager-

"You know why I am here; as for danger that is an old companion, of whom I have grown fond. But, Leola-where is she?" At the Posada Nacional, in the Plaza de

"How is she?" "Alas! sad and drooping-worse, despairing, said the girl, sadly. "The Plaza de Concordia is behind the Nation ale Palace and the Cathedral St. Pedro?"

"And the Posada Nacional. If I mistake not, is built as if between the two." "You are right, Senor," she said, eagerly, an wondering how he knew it so accurately. "So that one can enter-supposing the rossibi ity of secret doors-not an uncommon thing here-car enter the Posade either from the palace or the church." "Again you are right." 'So far, so good. Now, who is here?" "S-fiora Leola, her aunt, Sefiorita Cos, Vito and myself, are all at the Possda." "When cil the Senorita and her servant ar rive?" asked Travis, somewhat puzzled. "A week ago. Vito told me she saw you Monterey, on your march to Vera Cruz."

"Then be sure that you do not let her know that I am here. Did she tell you anything that passed between us ?"

"Nothing; more than that you had called se us, and she told you where we were." "Mar ano," said Travis, thoughtfully. you know Vito's parentage?"

"I do not. There is a deep mystery about her whole life, that I cannot unravel. Sue has some good impulses in her heart, but she is completely under the influence of the Grey Monk, and Castillies, and a more cunning little jesuit never lived."

"Where is the Grey Monk now?" asked Trav-
